HAUTE COUTURE WEEK: UNESCO PUTS AFRICAN FASHION DESIGNERS IN THE SPOTLIGHT

UNESCO will hold a conference at its headquarters to spotlight African designers on the sidelines Paris Haute Couture Week. This event will build on the momentum of the UNESCO report on African fashion, published in October 2023, which showed that the continent has all it takes to become one of the next global fashion leaders.

According to The UNESCO report, the panelists discussed over this study, that highlighted the huge market that represent the African Fashion Market of 30 €Bn, which is at the beginning of its potential huge growth to come.

« Im really tired of talking, it is not an idle to wash it ad celebrate it each 5 years. the report said the global opportunist form Dakar fashion weeks, till the rest of Africa, Is there any real platform, and how to finance, is it a loan, or grant, or other way of financing, so back to education, how to fill the curriculum. » Omoyemi Akerele (Nigeria), Founder and CEO of Lagos Fashion Week.

"I was appointed ambassador to UNESCO 10 years ago, and thanks to fashion, during the terrorist rebellion in Niger, we created objects to revive leucotomy at half mast. I thank Audrey Azoulay for renewing my role as peace ambassador, We are different countries, it took more than 10 years after creating in 1994, in Ghana, the African Fashion Federation, but it must be integrated, I welcomed 53 countries and this resulted in the creation of 40 000 jobs with jewelry in Niger We have to find the solutions" explains Alphadi (Niger), Fashion Designer and UNESCO Goodwill Ambassador for African innovation and creation who had the audacity to share his own expression and the initiatives already known and recognized by his peers, and the limitations and obstacles facing he was confronted for decades.

Laureen KOUASSI OLSSON (Ivory Coast), BIRIMIAN VENTURES since 2020, Capital Venture in Finance, who comes from the world of finance and out of passion, she chose fashion. "These are lessons in humility because it is very very difficult for investors to convince them because of fragile brands and the method of financing and capitalization is very difficult. We have taken a 360 degree turn, today we support 21 brands, but we need local specificities in addition to the pan-African approach. She adds that it is necessary to put in place a solid tax base and the equivalent of a large employers' union, like the MEDEF to give credibility to this fashion sector in Africa.

Aissa DIONE (Senegal) Textile Designer, explains how she raises the problem of "the process which would allow us to move to the pre-Industry stage and allow designers who must be able to find textile cottons and threads on the continent, with markets worth €30 billion and everything goes back to foreigners while we are the world producer of cotton"

Lulu SHABELL Founder of creativity Champion , from Tanzania, epxlpique quant a elle confirme les dires de Aissa « we had lots of time to talk , the investors would like to take risk and put money on advertising, this is so important for the designers. but given the belonging to a one continent, including 55 countries, despite having similarities, they have their own specificities to be exploited.This is a requirement if we hold the idea to build up a champion.

In Fance you have Federation de a Haute Couture, and many other unions, we need the same trustees and pillars in Africa I conceptualised a platform that a chose creativity to short cut African fashion and we give access to the designers, in partnership with Portugal fashion week.
